We declare under penalty of perjury:
1. We have an intimate, committed relationship of mutual caring;
2. We live together (“Live together” means that the two of you share a place to live. You don’t both have to be on the rental agreement or deed. It is okay if one or both of you has a separate place somewhere else. Even if one of you leaves the place you share, you still live together as long as the one who left intends to return.);
3. We agree to be responsible for each other’s basic living expenses during our domestic partnership; we also agree that anyone who is owed these expenses can collect from either of us (“Basic living expenses” means the cost of basic food and shelter. It also includes any other expense that is paid by a benefit you or your partner gets because of the partnership. For example, if you get health insurance from your job, and the insurance covers your partner, you will be responsible for medical bills that the insurance does not pay. You don’t have to split basic living expenses to be domestic partners. You just have to agree to provide these things for your partner if your partner is unable to do so);
4. We are both 18 years of age or older;
5. Neither of us is married;
6. Neither of us is related to the other as a parent, brother or sister, half-brother or half-sister, niece, nephew, aunt, uncle, grandparent or grandchild; and
7. Neither of us has a domestic partner now.

We declare under penalty of perjury under the laws of the State of California that the statements above are true and correct.
